Though the San Joaquin Valley's first Native American inhabitants may have created stretches of some Clovis trails, most of the trails have been developed far more recently, with today's walkers and cyclists in mind.

Take your pick, map out a course, and begin a healthy adventure that can last an entire day, or just part of a morning. More than 10 miles of walking and cycling trails meander through Clovis, and a total of more than 40 miles of trails are planned. Plus, you'll find plenty of public green spaces and community parks to stop and enjoy along the way.

Clovis Trails can be walked, hiked or cycled by adults and most children. Some trails, like the Clovis Old Town Trail, are paved, tree-lined concourses – easy on the feet and wheels, with rest stops along the way.

Other trails are more challenging, like the Dry Creek Trail, which starts and stops along a natural creek bed, or the Enterprise Trail, a wide trail meandering along an historic agricultural irrigation canal.

Trails of Clovis

Be sure to be careful crossing streets, and be considerate. Remember that some trails are well-maintained and well-marked, and others may begin or end without notice. Watch out for (and stay out of) private property, and be careful to respect and not disturb the folks living nearby.
